

Find me on Bumble

Introducing Bumble Handles.

For years, dating apps have worked one way: open the app and hope you stumble across someone worth meeting. But real life doesn't work that way.

You catch someone's eye across a room. A friend says, "You two should meet." You hear about someone who sparks your curiosity. Suddenly, there's a gap between wanting to connect and knowing how. Asking for a phone number can feel too personal. Tracking someone down on social media can feel intrusive. Your private and professional networks aren't necessarily where you want your dating life to begin.

That's why we're launching Bumble Handles.

We're building a bridge between real-life attraction and digital introductions, making Bumble a place to find someone you're already curious about.

Create a handle. Share it with someone you meet, have a friend pass it along, post it publicly, or simply say, "Find me on Bumble" with your handle, anywhere you're open to meeting new people. It's an invitation to connect, with clarity and intention, without handing over your personal information.

And importantly, the control stays with you:

- Anyone with your exact handle can find your Bumble profile and express interest.
- Mutual interest is still required.
- Your preferences and filters remain in place.
- Verification is required to create a handle.
- Being discoverable is always your choice.

Discoverable doesn't mean accessible. A handle opens the door to a potential connection, not to your private life.

Bumble began by giving women more control over how connections start. Handles takes that philosophy beyond the app and into the real world. The future of dating shouldn't be about spending more time looking at your phone. It should be about noticing more of the world around you, knowing there's an easier way to connect when someone catches your interest.

Real life creates the feeling. Bumble helps you make the move. Now you can expand your options by simply saying "Find me on Bumble" and adding your handle.

@whitney